* ` * ` * ` * ` * * * * * On-the-fly Previews, Reveal, and Erase No matter which program you use for editing, it is possible to gain insight into the stages of image editing while you work in a noneditable layer. Photoshop allows this with its on-the-fly previews. In Figure 11.2 (image courtesy of Adobe), you can see that the white areas are those that are unedited, or not exposed yet, while the black areas are those that are completely covered by either an inserted or a blank layer. With images on a layered background, you have the option to reveal or hide individual layers to see what is covered by a layer. On a transparent background, these functions are not available. * * * Figure 11.2 : The top image shows the initial selection of the background area. The white areas represent those areas that are still unexposed. The bottom image shows what will become the final image once the white areas are covered. When you bring a new layer into an image, it is automatically covered with a setting of 50 percent gray, which is the default value. It takes up space in the image, and it represents the area that will be covered. You can change the percentage if you choose. You can also get a quick, on-the-fly preview by pressing the Tab key to toggle the opacity of a new layer until you see the desired end result. The Reveal/Hide tool is covered in detail in Chapter 8, "Layer Comps." * *

Photo apps can remove backgrounds, retouch skin blemishes and blemishes, adjust brightness and contrast, adjust exposure and color, and more. Photoshop and Photoshop Elements are both capable of the majority of such edits, but Photoshop Elements tends to be easier to use and offers a wide variety of powerful but easy-to-use features. How do Photoshop and Photoshop Elements work? One of the most important aspects of an image is its background. Photographers use Photoshop and Elements to make photos look right and to protect their images from being easily altered. There are multiple ways to make a photo look right, whether you are looking to make a quick retouch or you are working with a large scale image. Photoshop and Photoshop Elements offer different methods to do so. Background Removal One of the most popular methods of photo editing is to remove the background of an image. Photoshop Elements is great at removing unwanted details that blend with the image, whether they be a nearby building, a window, or even a fly in the shot. You can see in the following example that Photoshop Elements was able to remove the wood grain from the window and the shadow it casts on the wall. Some basic knowledge of the tools and the selection tools will help.

Removing background can be a simple task with a bit of knowledge and practice. Fig 1. Photoshop Elements Basic Background Fig 2. Photoshop Elements Advanced Background Remove Fig 3.

Photoshop and Photoshop Elements have a variety of basic tools that can be used to accomplish this. Adjustments and filters Adobe Photoshop Elements offers a wide range of adjustments and filters that can be applied to images. Q: Getting touch events from the background activity of my application I have a application in which I need to get touch events from the background. So, I am embedding my activity into a service and when my activity becomes the foreground, I can access the view v with getWindow(). This works fine. The problem is that I need to handle the touch events in my activity when it's not the foreground activity, i.e. when my activity is suspended and when the user resumes. I tried handling the touch events in onCreate() but when the user brings my activity foreground, I lose the events. Any ideas? Thank you, A: This was very easy to do and may be helpful to others. Basically, you have to register the touch handler everytime you get a callback of onResume(), which you do automatically when your activity is activated. And you simply unregister the touch handler every time you get a callback of onPause(). Cheers!

Legislation Making Its Way Through State Senate Explores Whether Employees Of Public Works May Be Attacked Susan M. Davis of The Baltimore Sun Lawmakers are weighing legislation this session that would require public works employees to use personal firearms when they respond to incidents in which police officers are dispatched. But the bill faces opposition from the Police Union, which is pushing for a change in state law in the face of a Federal Bureau of Investigation crackdown on illegal gambling. Sen. C. Anthony Muse, the Democratic senator from Charles County who introduced the Senate version of the public works firearms bill, said he found it "odd that there is almost no mention of police officers, which is why I referred to it as a public works bill." "I really believe you should be able to protect your own life," said Muse, adding that the legislation was aimed at preventing innocent people from being killed by accidents involving public works employees. The Senate version, with an amendment, would require public works employees who are called to emergencies involving individuals with mental illness or intoxication to draw and discharge their firearms, unless police officers are on the scene. Muse, a Baltimore County Democratic commissioner, said the bill was also meant to protect the lives of public works employees who are called to perform services during a riot. Employees of public works agencies like the Department of Transportation and others also would be required to carry firearms. Muse said the legislation, the first public works firearms bill

Presidential candidate Donald Trump said Wednesday that veteran journalist Bob Woodward's new book, "Fear: Trump in the White House," was written for "political reasons" and has destroyed the lives of many people who were not involved in the Trump campaign or administration. "It's a book that is supposed to destroy lives," Mr. Trump told host Jeanine Pirro in an appearance on Fox News's "Justice with Judge Jeanine." "It's a book that's written for political reasons." In a preview excerpt, Mr. Woodward wrote that during his reporting on Mr. Trump's presidency, he witnessed "an unprecedented degree of chaos" and saw "a president who was often reckless and volatile, reacting to events as they developed rather than as he might have planned." "You have people in the White House who are nervous," Mr. Woodward said, quoting one unnamed source. "And at the same time, you have the president," he continued, quoting another, "who has absolutely no filter." Mr. Woodward was on "Fox & Friends" Wednesday morning to discuss his new book, as well as Mr. Trump's latest inflammatory remarks. "I think he would rather be talking about the FBI having a spy in his campaign," Mr. Woodward said, in reference to a New York Times report this week that Mr. Trump has been informed the Bureau is investigating any possible collusion between his 2016 presidential campaign and Russia. "If he continues down this path, it is just crazy what he is doing to the people. It's crazy what he is doing to his country and to the world," he added. "Fear," Mr. Woodward said, will be released on Sept. 11.
